Hello, today my colleague and myself we will present to you a bill on the theme of immigration in Europe.

This European Union law aims to establish a balanced framework between welcoming refugees in danger and integrating migrants who are not in danger, while respecting the principles of solidarity and human rights.

By exploring these important points, our goal is to address a fundamental question:

How can we manage both the arrival of people in danger seeking refuge and the integration of migrants who are not in danger in the countries of the European Union, while respecting ideas of sharing, fairness, and respect for human rights?

To begin with, we need to draw up a concrete proposal for the admission of refugees and migrants at risk within the European Union.

Absolutely, we could start by emphasizing the commitment of member states to fairly distribute refugees in danger according to their respective hosting capacities.

Yes, that’s crucial to ensure fair distribution while considering each country’s specific capacities.

Then, we should clearly establish admission criteria for these refugees. Reasons for fleeing, such as armed conflicts or political persecutions, should be at the core of these criteria.

And let’s not forget about first-degree family reunification. It’s a fundamental matter of humanity.

Absolutely, let’s also talk about educational services to facilitate their integration. Language is a major barrier, so allowing them the choice between the official language of the country or English would be a flexible and practical approach.

Now, let’s move on to the section regarding migrants not in danger. We need to establish strong criteria for their admission based on elements like language, education, professional experience, and good conduct to enable good integration into society while ensuring their commitment to the host country.

Exactly, an investment contract could guarantee this commitment, coupled with clear measures in case of non-compliance with the contract terms.
And let’s not overlook assessing their motivation to integrate. This could be decisive in the admission process.

Lastly, let’s emphasize that all decisions, whatever they may be, must be made in accordance with the fundamental principles of the Declaration of Human and Citizen Rights. Equality, non-discrimination, and the dignity of each individual must always be preserved.

Exactly, Our goal is to establish a balanced and fair framework for admitting refugees and migrants not in danger while respecting fundamental human rights.

This proposal reflects our values and commitment to a respectful and fair immigration policy, providing a just framework for the future of the European Union.

Thank you for listening, and we hope our project has convinced you.
